

Placing People-First

At U.S. Lubricants, we have created a culture of team members who value caring relationships and serving their communities. While the motive is different for each person, the end goal is the same...to contribute to the greater good and make the world a better place.

Meet Marcos

At a young age, Marcos attended military school and joined the army. After his service, Marcos became known throughout his community as a leader and someone who steps up whenever and wherever needed. This attribute is evident in his involvement with coaching baseball as well as helping with his children's cross country and track and field events. When you don't find Marcos volunteering with his children, you can find him at American Legion Post 94, Environment for Valpo meetings, fundraisers, and various events. But his acts of service don't stop there. In his professional life, at U.S. Lubricants, Marcos goes above his normal truck driving duties to train other team members and offer advice to provide an excellent customer experience.

His manager, Danielle, has high praise for Marcos, "Marcos has been a vital part of our team for over five years. He helps our drivers with their daily runs and location of tanks, and is always proactive with keeping us up-to-date before issues arise."

"I volunteer to be involved in my children's lives, and to be there for my community," Marcos said.

Marcos is an excellent example of the type of team member we look for...people that share our core values and live them out daily. He steps up for his community, his work, and his customers and we are fortunate to have him on our team.
